

Truman Hoyle welcomes Optus counsel

Truman Hoyle lured Hamish Fraser (pictured) away from Optus, where he was a senior in-house counsel. Fraser joins the firm's communications law practice as special counsel.

Hamish Fraser,
Truman Hoyle

"Hamish's appointment will be of great benefit to both the firm and its growing list of communications and technology clients," managing partner Shane Barber said.

"Hamish has considerable industry experience at the cutting edge of communications law and regulation in the Asia-Pacific region and will be highly sought after, not only by our commercial clients, but by the industry bodies and regulators we advise."

In addition to communications regulatory expertise, Fraser focuses on information technology and intellectual property contracting and risk management.

Before entering the legal arena, Fraser practised as an engineer in computer programming for civil engineering projects.

Fraser is a past president of the Queensland Society for Computers and the Law and a frequent speaker on communications and technology issues, including for the Australian Information Industry Association.