

Truman Hoyle expands Communications Law Practice

Truman Hoyle has significantly expanded its communications and technology practice with the appointment of Hamish Fraser as Special Counsel.

Prior to joining Truman Hoyle Hamish was Senior Counsel with the Optus Group for four years. Prior to that time, Hamish practised as a Senior Lawyer with another leading telecommunications and technology law firm. As well as a degree in law, Hamish has a degree in Engineering and is a past President of the Queensland Society for Computers and the Law.

Hamish acts for a wide range of clients, from start-ups to global organisations establishing significant businesses in the Asia Pacific market.

Hamish advises on commercial issues, regulatory matters and dispute work for clients engaging in all facets of the information, communications and technology industries, including in relation to intellectual property protection, licensing and distribution, confidentiality, Ecommerce, security, IT procurement and outsourcing.

In addition to legal experience Hamish has also acted as a commercial adviser to divisional managing directors at Optus in various roles.

“Hamish adds further depth to our already significant communications and technology practice serving the new economy industries across the Asia Pacific regions,” Managing Partner, Shane Barber said. “Hamish’s industry connections will be an invaluable asset to our many clients in this area.”

Truman Hoyle will shortly announce the appointment of a new partner and team in its corporate and commercial practice.
